Warnock's note from 1991 still reads like a product brief:

> A file should look the same on every machine in the building, regardless of which fonts that machine happens to have installed.

That sentence explains why paragraphs were never first-class data.